Pediatric Hematology
Oncology Educational Specialists

A Joint National Conference for professionals working together to address the educational needs of patients.

Information about APHOES and AECMN

The Association of Pediatric Hematology Oncology Educational Specialists (APHOES) is a group of professionals (nurses, psychologists, social workers, child life specialists, school and hospital-based educators, physicians and others) that work together to address the educational needs of pediatric hematology and oncology patients. The group first convened in November 2005 out of a shared desire to improve the educational outcomes of pediatric hematology and oncology patients and to standardize the methods that yield positive outcomes. Since that time, APHOES members have gathered several times to draft and refine these standards, to network with other professionals and to collaborate on projects. APHOES began offering professional development opportunities at the working group meetings which has evolved into an annual conference with a robust presentation agenda.

The Association for the Education of Children with Medical Needs (AECMN) is a non-profit organization comprised of educational professionals committed to working with children with medical needs. As an organization, AECMN works to serve the unique needs of our students by raising awareness about their educational challenges, collaborating with like-minded professionals, and partnering with similar local and national organizations. It's the lifework of AECMN to advocate for the delivery of appropriate educational services for these children and identify best practices of teaching students with medical needs.
